SIGN OF LOVE

IN the air, above the pine woods surrounding the big vacation resort, the clouds hung white and fluffy. Behind the lovers, the big hotel and its smaller ring of cottages lay nested in the forest. From where they stood, they could see the rippling lake, famous for fifty miles around as Love Lake.

Henry Stilson took Julie Sayers hand. Julie sighed, looking up at Henry. Julie thought he was altogether handsome. It was a pleasure to have Henry holding her hand and even more than a pleasure now that he'd asked her to marry him.

"Of course, darling, of course," she murmured.

Henry squeezed her hand, shyly. "It's wonderful, isn't it?" he asked huskily. "I mean, our getting engaged here."

"Here?"

"Well, our parents got engaged here, didn't they? I know my folks did — and your dad told me the other evening that he and your mother did."

"I guess lots of people from our town got engaged here," Julie said dreamily.

"Sure, that's why the hotel is so popular. People come back every year just to be near the place where they got engaged. I—I suppose we'll be doing that, years from now!"

Julie nodded, glancing back toward the hotel and its cottages. One of them was the cottage her folks had rented for the summer weekends. Another was Henry's folks'. They didn know she and Henry were engaged yet.

"You were here last year, weren't you, darling?" Julie asked. "I mean, while dad and mother and I were up in Canada. I was here the year before when you and your folks were up to the city."

"It was pretty nice," Henry agreed. Then he chuckled pleasantly. "Gosh, I never realized then that we'd be getting engaged now."

They approached a big pine surrounded by smaller ones. "What are you doing?" Julie asked.

Henry was fumbling in his pockets. "Trying to find my penknife," he said. "I—I'd like to cut out our initials on this tree."

"Oh, that would be wonderful," Julie said enthusiastically. "It's such a romantic idea, Henry. Why, I remember . . ."

"Yes, you remember . . .?"

"Oh, nothing," Julie said hurriedly. "Go ahead, sweetheart."

Henry found his knife and began carving a heart on the tree.

"You do it so well," Julie said. "Almost as if . . . oh!"

Henry jumped. "What's the matter?"

"That's funny," she said, peering off to one side of where Henry was carving. "There's another heart, with your initials on it."

"Well," began Henry, uneasily. "There must be lots of people with my initials, even if they haven't got my name."

"I suppose so," Julie said, dubiously. "But look at the other initials linked with yours: E.W. Why—why that stands for Ellen Warren."

"Ellen W-W-Warren?" Henry stammered.

"Certainly, Ellen Warren," Julie said angrily. "Ellen Warren was up here last year—and so were you! Oh, Henry . . ." Julie took out her handkerchief and began weeping into it. "You told me ours were the first hearts you'd ever carved. Why . . ." she stamped her foot again. "We haven't been engaged more than ten minutes—and you've already told me a big lie!"

"I did not!" Henry said hotly.

"You did!" Julie cried. "Those are your initials and Ellen's in—in a pair of hearts!"

"They are not!" Henry said. He glanced away from her. Suddenly he uttered a shout and stepped over to another tree.

"Aha!" he said triumphantly. "Look at this!"

"Look at what?" Julie demanded, following him.

"Right there!" Henry said, pointing to a spot on the other tree. "You were up here two years ago, weren't you? And Terry Haskins was up here with his family, then, too. Well, there's your initials and Terry's carved in those two hearts!"

"Ridiculous!" Julie said, peering closer. Then she turned pale. "Well, I'd have to admit they're my initials — and — and maybe Terry Haskins, but . . ."

"You were sweet on him for awhile, years back," Henry said accusingly. "And you told me you'd never had your initials matched with anyone else's but mine!"

Julie looked at him, furiously.

Henry glared back. "To think you were accusing me of telling you lies!" Henry said angrily. Then he paused, out of breath. Finally he put a placating hand out toward her.

"Julie — Julie darling, look, let's forget it. A few minutes ago we were happy. Now . . ."

Julie whirled about and ran, sobbing, back toward her parents' cottage

Halfway back she stopped, considering. Her tear-blurred eyes cleared. Yes, Henry was right, she decided. It was foolish of them to fight over the past. But — she thought suddenly — something had to be done right away to wipe it out. Julie ran up to her cottage. Her parents were out.

She selected a sharp knife from the kitchen table and ran back toward the grove of pine trees where she'd left Henry. Julie didn't see Henry as he stepped from behind the big tree which had his initials and Ellen Warren's on it.

"Oh, Henry!" Julie gasped. "You startled me!" She glanced down at his hand. "What—what are you doing with that knife?"

"What are you doing with that knife?" Henry retorted.

Julie blushed.

"Well," she said. "I realized you were right about forgetting the past, so I decided to get a knife and carve that heart and those horrible initials off that other tree. You see—I know you won't believe it—but Terry didn't carve my initials with his. I don't know who did, but . . ."

A chipping sound off to the left made them both turn.

"Someone's there, hidden in the trees," Henry said. "Come on!" They tiptoed toward the source of the sound.

"For heaven's sake," Julie whispered in astonishment as the source came into view.

"Well, I'll be . . ." Henry began.

"It's the hotel janitor," Julie said.

"And he's carving hearts and initials on trees. Look, every tree is covered with them — and I know they weren't here yesterday." Henry strode sternly up to the janitor, who straightened up, startled, as Henry touched his shoulder and asked him what he was doing.

"Hey, young feller?" the janitor said, pointing to his ear. "I'm a little deef." When Henry repeated his question, the janitor smiled embarrassedly.

"Oh, these hearts," he said, guiltily, with an air of being caught. "Promise you won't tell, young feller?" Henry promised and the janitor went on: "Well, the management noticed that modern folks weren't cutting so many hearts on the trees, so they sent me to carve some. They want to keep up the romantic reputation of the place. What's that, young feller? Whose initials do I use? Oh, I just make 'em up out of my head. Now don't forget you promised not to . . ."

Henry and Julie turned away, smiling, and walked back to their own tree. Julie sighed as Henry started to carve a second heart with his and Julie's initials. Then, hand in hand, they stepped back and regarded it

"Well, that's one set of permanent hearts and initials that janitor won't carve—because I did!" Henry said proudly. He kissed Julie. "Guess we'd better go back and tell the folks we got engaged!"
